October 22, 2015 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Same Race Production has announced that the book, "The Eighth Round," which is an autobiography by former boxer Zeke Wilson, will soon be released in movie form. Meanwhile, the book itself continues to be very popular and those who are interested can see the book here. The company is also looking for sponsors for the movie, which will be released later this month.

Zeke Wilson says: "The book is an autobiography over how I fought for what is right, trying to end same-race discrimination and racism as a whole. It describes how I took this fight to the top, often without any legal representation. It is a story of hardship, but mainly a story of triumph. I am incredibly proud of my team who have turned this book into a movie and I believe that it will grip the nation."

In Zeke's book, he demonstrates that it is possible to fight for what is right, even if a person lacks money, education or knowledge. He discusses the rules of equal treatment, many of which are purposefully kept hidden by the people in power. He also helps people to identify whether their personal rights have been violated. Another big part of the book is how it is possible to get a lawyer to agree to argue a case, even if someone is unable to afford one. Finally, he explains why it is so important to be personally involved in the complaint process.

"While my book is autobiographical, it often reads as a help guide because I cover so many of the things that people need to know in their own fight for what is right," adds Zeke Wilson. "The movie, by contrast, really brings that story home. In it, I don't just explain to people how they can fight for their rights, but I am able to demonstrate how I did it."

Those who are curious about the film can watch the trailer.
