Destin, Fla.- The travel industry has been hit hard by the pandemic, but perhaps the sector that has felt it the most is cruise lines. Unfortunately, when the pandemic arose, cruise line operations came to a crashing halt. However, after these long months of inactivity, cruise lines are optimistic going forward, elated to set sail again in the near future! To help keep cruisers informed, Have Travel Memories, a travel advisor in Destin, FL, is explaining the changes that cruise lines will likely implement to promote safety when they resume operations.

When cruise ships set sail once again, they will likely operate at limited capacity to enable passengers to remain distanced from each other. This could also include allowing only a limited number of passengers in certain areas of the boat at a time. Similar to many other establishments, cruise lines will likely require passengers to wear face coverings when unable to social distance, as well as present a negative COVID-19 test and a completed health questionnaire before boarding the ship.

Cruisers can also anticipate seeing physical distancing and safety promoters, such as floor markers, hand sanitizing stations, plexiglass barriers, and spaced seating in common areas, as well as staggered boarding and disembarking times to prevent large crowds. When it comes to dining, the extravagant buffets that cruises are known for may experience some changes. Some cruise lines will likely do away with buffets for a period of time, whereas others will stick with their buffets but have staff members serve passengers instead of using the traditional self-serve system. As far as shore excursions go, cruise lines may have to reduce their typical selection of excursions upon stopping at certain ports. This will be dependent on the specific restrictions and protocols that have been implemented by the locals of each destination.

While there are many changes that cruisers will experience when they are finally able to board the ships once again, the elements that make a cruise unforgettable will remain in place: the memorizing views from the ship deck, the luxury of relaxation during sea-days, and the enlightening experiences that come with stepping foot off the ship and onto an unfamiliar piece of the Earth.
