COVID 19 has greatly affected the way people live every day life and most people are now weary about going into public spaces. Enforcing masks and social distancing is a good start, but going the extra step and looking for ways to deep clean a building will better ensure the safety of both workers and customers. "A lot of business owners right now are very fearful about staying afloat during the pandemic," says owner, Jim Seubert. "That's why Pride Restoration of NC has developed a process that has been very effective in providing deep cleaning for businesses when needed."

How Cleaning and Sanitization Keeps People Safe

Every company that specializes in cleaning and sanitization services has a unique process that's suited to fit the community. Pride Restoration of NC follows a three step process that has been developed specifically to determine the individual disinfection needs of businesses that experience a high traffic of people.

Step 1: Pride Restoration of NC starts the process with an initial assessment. The team inspects each business and identifies the areas with a highest amount of people touching them and surfaces that could be a biohazard. High tech equipment is then used to test these areas to precisely determine where disinfection is needed the most.

Step 2: The next step of the process is containment. The areas that are determined to be especially high risk are sectioned off to prepare for cleaning and disinfection services.

Step 3: Finally, quality testing takes place where Pride Restoration of NC uses professional grade technology to test the high touch areas for a final time. Pride Restoration of NC then provides clients with the final contamination numbers to document exactly what percentage of bacteria is left on the surface.
