December 31, 2020 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Destin, Fla.- Have Travel Memories, a travel agency in Destin, FL, is discussing the rise of workcations resulting from the pandemic, as well as how the travel industry is responding to this change.

Everyone has heard of a ?staycation,? but not many know about what about a ?workcation? is. The term has gained much popularity in the last several months as people grow antsy from being in their homes. Put simply, a workcation is a regular vacation, but the traveler does not take any time off work for it; they perform their work responsibilities from whichever location they chose to travel to.

The travel industry is expecting workcations to continue growing in popularity as 2021 begins. Because the pandemic has led many companies to allow their employees to work from home, there are more people working remotely than ever before. Working from home has its advantages, but not going into an office every day comes with a few challenges. Many remote workers find themselves growing tired of residing in their homes for the majority of every day and begin longing for a change of scenery. This is where workcations come in. With the ability to work remotely, taking a trip no longer means dipping into those precious vacation days from work. Taking work to the road allows a remote worker to experience a change in environment without having to sacrifice work responsibilities.

The travel industry is expecting workcations to become increasingly popular in the near future. Businesses in the tourist industry have already begun adapting to this change by adjusting their offers to appeal to individuals and families considering a workcation. Some hotels, for example, are creating special extended-stay offers for individuals and families who want to work or complete schoolwork from a vacation spot. The rise of workcations could very well benefit the travel industry as it works to recover from the pandemic.
