Apex Environmental, a pest control service in Leeds, says that it is offering its services at a quality that greatly exceeds the price tag. The service says that it strives to do the best job possible for all of its customers at the most competitive prices. The service is fast and hassle-free as the company says that it adheres to strict professional standards.

Apex Environmental Leeds offers pest management solutions for pests such as rats, mice, wasps, ants, fleas, woodworms, bedbugs, cockroaches, flies, carpet beetles, moles, squirrels, beetles, pigeons, rabbits, and more. The service is discreet as it uses unmarked vehicles. This allows anyone to call up the company and avail of its services without alarming or letting their neighbors get a whiff of the type of service being used.

The company says that while selecting a competent pest control service, customers should look for are quality and value. They compel customers to ask questions about the pest control company about the services it offers. These queries include how many years has the company been in business at its present address, would the pest control company be willing to provide them with a list of references, will the person(s) performing the services be a certified, licensed pesticide applicator or a licensed technician, and finally, would the company provide the customer with a copy of its license, copies of the labels for all pesticides used and the rates at which they will be applied.

The company identifies a few indicators that signify the pest control company might not be offering the best quality of service or value for the customer. One sign is if the company offers to do the job as part of a package deal, such as general home repair or tree trimming, or that will give its customers a special price if treatment is done immediately. Another telltale sign is if the company doesn?t have a listed or working telephone number. Another sign of a sketchy company is if it sells services door-to-door or targets the elderly or infirm persons who live alone. The company stresses that it is of the greatest importance to check their identification and credentials.

A sign that a company might not be honest in its dealings is if it arrives unexpectedly and shows the customer insects they have found in their neighbor?s house as evidence of a neighborhood problem. A sure sign of malpractice is if the company quotes a per-gallon price since termite control can require several hundred gallons of diluted insecticide. Another surefire way of telling if a company is not what it claims to be is if it says that it has a secret formula. The company says that all pesticide products must be registered. Registered pesticide labels contain a list of active ingredients.

The company tells customers to be wary of pest control services that try to pressure them into immediately signing a contract by suggesting their house is structurally unsound and may collapse if not treated. Another sign of a company to avoid is if they claim to have excess material left over from a previous job and offer a reduced price for immediate treatment. Finally, a sign of fraudulent practice is if the company claims to be endorsed by any government agency since government agencies do not endorse any service company or specific pesticide product.

The company also stresses the importance of safety when performing pest management in residential or commercial property. The company says that a competent pest control service will know to use the right pesticides and chemicals in the right parts of the house. The wrong selection can be a health hazard to the occupants of the home. A truly skilled professional pest control technician will also know how to avoid contaminating the areas of the house that are frequented by most homeowners. The company says they know their trade enough to target only the problem areas while leaving the rest of the house untouched leading to a safer overall experience for the homeowners.
