September 18, 2015 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

Debtconsolidationloansbadcredit.org has recently announced the launch of their new site, which is designed to serve consumers who are looking for ways on how to become debt free. The site offers information to consumers in all 50 states about debt consolidation loans for becoming debt free.

Founder of the site, Keith Baxter of Kingwood, TX, stated, "There is a lot of information out there; so much so that people get confused and frustrated when trying to sort through it all. Our site is designed to put relevant information at consumers' fingertips, so that they can easily determine the best course of action for their individual needs."

Debt consolidation advice, such as when and how to secure a debt consolidation financial service, is offered, along with tips for finding the right one and warnings about things that consumers should watch for when shopping for them.

"Any financial service is not going to do it," states Baxter. "Consumers need to know that some of these will actually make it harder for them to clear their debt. It comes down to choosing one that is actually going to lower monthly payments and put multiple debts into one easily manageable payment."

Reports from various financial institutions show that American consumers so far in 2015 have a combined debt of more than $11 trillion. This number represents an increase of nearly two percent over that of 2014. "People just need to know how to handle debt, how to make it manageable, and that's what we're here for," states Baxter.

Specific advice from the website covers things like credit card debt and how to get out from under it, how to create more income to better handle monthly payments, and even how to save on groceries every week to cut down on household expenses. There are pages for getting out of debt that relate to each of the 50 states, as some state laws and regulations may differ regarding consolidation services, interest rates, and general debt.
