National Center for Assisted Living statistics says that more than 835,000 Americans currently reside in assisted living communities. The average length of stay at an assisted living facility is around 22 months after which the resident moves onto a higher level of care like a nursing home. The number of people living in some sort of senior living community is set to double by 2030. The advisors at Senior Care Center say that they understand the difficulties faced by families when it comes to finding a safe home for their loved ones. There are a lot of details that have to be thought of and considered before making a decision.

The primary requirement is considering the type of care that is required. There are different levels and types of care offered at assisted living centers. The best home is the one where the kind of care provided matches the affliction that the senior is dealing with. For example, those with Alzheimer's and other diseases that affect the mental faculties, require memory care homes that are specially designed for that purpose. The staff at such memory care centers is properly trained to help seniors who are dealing with some form of dementia. The client's medical history, therefore, plays a huge role in selecting the perfect senior care home. The facilities should also be vetted for the provision of services such as dietary needs or cultural and religious preferences. Families would prefer if their loved ones received the kind of cuisine that they have been used to most of their life. It would also benefit the mental health and overall mood of the elderly if they lived with others who share the same cultural experience. It helps them form strong bonds with those around them. Senior homes that focus on activities and provide ample opportunities for the elderly to socialize are also desired because they have a positive effect on the resident's happiness.

Finally, there is the consideration of budget and location. It can be hard to find a location that fits within the limited means of the elderly, especially if they are not supported by a pension or don't have enough savings. Many families try their best to stretch every dollar as far as they can. The location is also important as the family will want to make regular visits to their loved ones. There is nothing else that has the same effect on a senior person's mental wellbeing as being regularly visited and being cared for by their family. The location will play a major factor in how convenient it is for the family to see their elderly from time to time.

When a family signs up with Senior Care Center, the advisors do a thorough job of understanding their requirements. They listen with a keen ear to figure out the needs of the family. They will then consult their database of senior care homes to find something that perfectly matches the criteria. The advisors' job is not finished after a recommendation as they help the family fill out all the paperwork required. They can even schedule tours and visits to the senior care homes for the families to examine the facilities provided. After the desired home is picked, the advisors can also help the elderly move-in.
