Maria Gudelis, a life and business coach based in London, Ontario, Canada, has stressed the importance of believing in oneself in episode six of her series of podcasts that are available on Apple Podcasts, Spotify, and Stitcher. In the fifth episode, she discussed the value of believing in what one is offering, which is part of the holy marketing trinity or belief triad. The next important belief in this triad is belief in oneself, which is discussed in the sixth episode. Belief in oneself has to do with what one wants to create, such as the kind of business that one wants to establish. Maria Gudelis explains that belief in oneself provides a person with unlimited potential and those interested in learning more about the belief plan with Maria Gudelis may want to check out her podcasts.

Maria Gudelis explains, "Your power is in choosing selectively what you're going to do. And your power is using your mind and the belief in you to create, as if you had a blank canvas, to create that vision, and then you determine what the plan is or what the path is to get there. And that's really important because what is relevant here is what you want to create. Because if you don't spend the time really thinking about this, it's going to be hard to not fall prey (because our brains are sneaky) to a path your heart and mind don't want to be on."

She points out that people will usually suffer from what is known as the shiny object syndrome (SOS), which is the tendency to pursue a particular idea or trend without first carefully evaluating its potential with the result that one is distracted in pursuing a particular goal. In this podcast episode, Maria Gudelis also provides three exercises or tools that people can use to unlock their brilliance. In the seventh episode, she focuses on one's belief in one's client, which completes the triad of beliefs. Those who want to listen to all Maria Gudelis episodes can check out her website.
