Hit and run accidents leave victims with injuries, property damage, and medical bills. The Nashville car accident chiropractor admits that things get worse when there is no one to sue for damages, adding that such incidents are not completely avoidable, but there are things you can do after your accident to protect yourself.

One of the most important steps that an accident victim should take is to contact a Nashville car accident doctor and report the incident to the police. In a previous press release, the Nashville chiropractor explains that Advanced Injury Care Clinic Offers Best Medical Help to Car Accident Victims. The car accident chiropractor explains the need to report the hit and run to a police officer, who can assess the accident scene and record the victim's side of the story in order to prepare a police report to begin an investigation into the accident.

Even if the police can't find the person behind your hit and run, their accident report can be submitted to your insurance company and used in your favor. If you are lucky enough for them to find the driver, that person could face jail time, fines, and a driver's license suspension, depending on the severity of the accident. The at-fault party is liable to pay for damages. In order for the negligent driver to be held accountable, it is important to identify them.

This requires writing down as much information as possible about the accident and taking pictures of the accident scene. The car accident chiropractic clinic advises noting the license number or any part of it, make, model, and color of the vehicle. Any identifying spots may help trace the vehicle. Anybody who witnessed the hit and run might help as a witness in the case. The car crash doctor advises requesting their contact information.

If you got a good look at the driver, write down their gender, race, weight, height, etc. ?

The Nashville car accident chiropractor emphasizes taking pictures of any skid marks on the road or paint smears on the car along with damages to the vehicle, warning not to chase the person responsible for the accident. It's best to gather as much information from the scene as possible and wait for assistance from the police.
