The article talks about how one must change and update one's wardrobe in order to suit the season. For that, one must first be aware of the clothing that one already owns. To quote the post, "Do you have anything in your wardrobe which may be okay for next season? We are all being encouraged to spend less on clothes and buy fewer clothes in the first place. It seems that many of the ways in which we produce clothes are having a harmful effect on our environment." The importance of sustainable usage and purchasing clothes as needed as opposed to on a whim is emphasized in the post.

For the dual benefit of being eco-friendly and financially balanced, it is worth noting that there is no need to buy a completely new wardrobe for every season. In order to spend wisely, one must first think about what one needs (in two separate lists). The first list is for the clothes one will need for work and the other should be for leisure wear, which would include casual wear and even party wear. The article also brings attention to the fact that most people only wear 10% of the clothes they own. To put it simply, spending less on clothes is a good idea.

The article presents a novel idea: shopping in charity or thrift shops. One way to save money on clothes, and to even find better quality clothes, is to shop in charity shops. Many smart shoppers save a small fortune by shopping in charity shops. One may be able to find genuine and even designer clothes at a fraction of the original cost. Once one is accustomed to shopping in charity shops, one would even be able to find some good bargains. As the article states, "You will be pleasantly surprised when you find out how many people 'dump' some really nice clothes in charity shops. Who knows? you may even pick up a designer bag if you are lucky?"

Another concept presented by the article is to pay more for high quality clothes. Paying more for quality clothing is another good way of saving money in the long run. Instead of rushing out to buy a cheap garment, spending a little more on a better-quality garment would enable one to be able to wear and maintain the clothes for a longer period of time with minimal wear and tear. The article points out that some brands are better than others, and one should look out for clothes which are rich in cotton. Clothes made from cotton-rich fabrics are less likely to shrink and will stay looking sharper for longer. The article also points out that one can put some of one's clothes up for resale at a local sale. One may have a bigger budget for one's updated wardrobe by selling the clothes which one does not need if they are in good condition.
