Remittio, a multinational payment transfer service offering secure banking alternatives for spending, storing, and accepting money instantly, has announced that they will be making a presentation at the upcoming Dublin Web Summit 2015. The company explained that with the use of the most technologically advanced network, secure transaction methods are simplified with no requirements of traditional banking or additional fees. Those using the system can safely store and transmit financial assets instantly.

"Our business provides the ability to secure financial assets in a volatile world while accepting, spending, and storing money unbound by settlement options," states Michael, a spokesperson for the company.

The Web Summit is in its fifth year, and is a conference held in Dublin that centers on internet technologies. Attendees include a number of Fortune 500 companies and executives from some of the world's most well-known tech companies.

"We couldn't be more honored at being asked to present," points out Michael. "We feel that this is our chance to show the world what we've got."

The web summit has grown substantially since its first meeting in 2010. With only around 400 attendees in the first year, it has well surpassed that initial meeting, with more than 22,000 attendees from over 100 different countries attending the 2014 event.

Early count suggests that attendance during the November 3rd through 5th event will surpass 30,000. The event is held in Dublin, Ireland, and is normally comprised of different summits. The 2014 event focused on machine, enterprise, builders, and marketing.

Remittio is among a number of other technology based companies that will be presenting their current and future ideas to those in attendance. The company works closely with Bitchares Blockchain Technology. This technology is an industrial grade financial platform that delivers with the speed of NASDAQ, according to the company.
