The top Savannah personal injury law firm starts with advice for victims to seek medical attention immediately after the collision, even if they do not immediately have apparent injuries. The truck accident attorneys explain that some "accident injuries are hidden and don't show symptoms right away, and insurance companies are more likely to deny injury claims if you wait to receive treatment."

The Brown Firm suggests truck accident victims in Savannah call the police right away even if they don't need emergency medical attention, stating, "If you believe the truck driver was at fault for the accident, a police report can help back up your claim."

The Savannah truck accident law firm explains the need to take pictures of the accident scene, road condition, and the surrounding area to gather evidence against the negligent driver and prove their liability. Additionally, The Brown Firm urges accident victims to get witness statements and contact information. "A witness can prove valuable for your case, especially if the insurance companies try to assign liability to you."

The law firm in Savannah cautions victims against giving a recorded statement to the negligent party's insurance provider without seeking legal advice from an experienced truck accident attorney.

Harry Brown, Jr., DC, JD, the managing attorney of The Brown Firm, explains how truck accidents are often more extreme than car collisions. Semi-Truck heavy loads and can prove to be fatal for smaller passenger vehicles, as they do not have "protection needed to shield them from an impact with a big truck, increasing the damage caused to those vehicles during a truck crash."

"Truck accidents also make it much harder for first responders to navigate the roads, leaving victims trapped in their vehicles much longer." Brown explains that no two truck accidents are alike, and there is no standard amount for truck accident lawsuits, adding that there are several factors to determine the value of a compensation claim. The top trucking accident attorney lists both economic and non-economic damages to determine the value of a lawsuit.

Settlement amounts tend to vary widely, depending on physical, emotional, and financial injuries. A majority of trucking accidents are caused due to driver errors. The truck accident lawyers emphasize driver exhaustion, speeding, panic, driving distracted, and poor directional control as the leading causes of accidents. The blog post lists problems with brakes as one of the most common risk factors in commercial truck accidents, followed by environmental factors.

The Brown Firm trucking accident lawyers in Savannah have been fighting compensation claims on behalf of victims, proving the truck driver's negligence in taking due care in the truck's operation. In some cases, the trucking company is at fault for failing to adhere to federal and state safety regulations. The Brown Firm explains that seriously injured victims can make a truck accident claim for lost wages, pain and suffering, permanent injury, medical treatment cost, and loss of consortium. The Brown Firm team of truck accident lawyers has expertise in fighting for the victim's family's rights if the accident is fatal. "If a loved one was killed in a trucking accident, you might be able to bring a claim for the loss of the victim's income and companionship."

Harry Brown warns victims not to accept the first settlement offer from the truck driver's insurance company, adding that this is the least amount the insurance provider is likely to offer. This amount may not cover lost wages, pain and suffering, and treatment costs.

The Savannah truck accident law firm stresses the importance of working with an experienced team of attorneys for victims to get the compensation needed to make a complete financial recovery and move on with life.
