Pensacola, Fla ? As a result of the pandemic, many businesses have closed, and people have lost jobs, forcing them to take out loans or turn to credit cards to pay bills. Although businesses are reopening and people are returning to work as normal, the amounts of debt accumulated during the pandemic are still troubling to some. The results of this cycle have many weighing the options for debt relief.

According to local bankruptcy attorneys Martin Lewis and Steven Jurnovoy, it can be common for those struggling with debt to choose to do without important medication or eat fewer meals in order to pay creditors. Thankfully, there are bankruptcy laws in place to enable people to pay for the essentials and to help rebuild their lives. In Florida, debtors earning less than $50,000 per year are entitled to use their income for necessities rather than paying back creditors. Filing for bankruptcy allows debtors to fully use this law and regain control of their finances.

"There is no reason to feel bad about bankruptcy. If you have heart problems, you visit the heart doctor. If you have financial problems, you visit a bankruptcy attorney,? stated Steven Jurnovoy, local bankruptcy attorney.

The best way to get a hold of financial issues is by taking proactive steps to take care of the problem. When considering filing for bankruptcy, it is always best to consult with a professional attorney to explore all options available.

As experts in debt consolidation, Lewis and Jurnovoy have a proven record across the Florida Panhandle for helping clients resolve financial situations. They are dedicated to helping clients make knowledgeable decisions in choosing the best plan of action according to their specific situation. The firm specializes in both Chapter 7 and Chapter 13 bankruptcy cases, offering a free consultation to potential clients who may be considering bankruptcy.
