

Drug and Alcohol Addiction Are on the Rise in Long Beach Muse Addiction Treatment Center Responds

May 07, 2021

LOS ANGELES, CA - May 07, 2021 -

Long Beach, CA ? Long Beach, California, like cities and towns across the country, has seen an upswing in cases of drug and alcohol addiction in recent years. A thorough investigation regarding the number of people suffering from addiction in Long Beach, has shown a marked increase in overdoses and deaths associated with drug or alcohol consumption. The COVID-19 pandemic is one contributing factor in the increase in substance abuse, however, this trend seems to predate the pandemic. It's essential to address the needs of people struggling with addiction and Muse Treatment Center in Los Angeles is doing just that.

Muse believes that in order for a person to truly overcome addiction, it's essential to identify the life events or triggers that led to substance abuse in the first place. For some, suffering from an undiagnosed and untreated mental illness is the driving force behind addiction. In an attempt to cope with common mental health disorders like anxiety, depression and post-traumatic stress disorder, people frequently turn to alcohol and drugs as a form of self-medication.

Unfortunately using drugs and alcohol only temporarily numbs the emotional pain associated with poor mental health and, in the long run, makes the problem worse. Muse, offers specialized dual diagnosis treatment to treat mental illness and addiction at the same time, helping clients achieve lasting change.

Other factors that contribute to addiction include unresolved physical and emotional trauma. Physical trauma can lead to chronic pain and long-term use of opioid painkillers. The devastating effects of using opioid drugs long term and the lasting consequences of addiction have been seen across the US. Emotional trauma also frequently leads to self-medication attempts similar to the behavior pattern that exists around mental health conditions and substance abuse.

For anyone considering enrolling in an addiction treatment program in the Los Angeles area, it's important to thoroughly research the options and find a quality alcohol and drug rehab. Be sure to find a treatment center that is fully accredited by independent certifying bodies like the Joint Commission. It's also important to read reviews from former clients on third-party sites like Google. Be sure to call the treatment center and ask questions about the range of treatment options and various levels of care. The best addiction treatment centers will offer a full continuum of care and tailor treatment plans to meet the unique needs of each individual client.
