Canyon Gate, Nevada - June 11, 2021 - PRESSADVANTAGE -

NV Locksmith, a 5-star rated, local, family-owned and operated locksmith company in Nevada, has introduced access control security systems for businesses. These systems have been created to address the specific needs of businesses that want extra security for their inventory and intellectual property. Modern access control systems allow unprecedented control over who can enter and move about a business's premises. The strict control over personnel and even finer control of selective access to certain sections of the building allow the business to utilize space in the most efficient and secure manner. Modern access control systems are flexible enough to be useful for companies with any number of employees. Regardless of the profession, a business can always benefit from securing its property.

Modern access control systems are customizable to a very high degree. The building owners can assign different access levels to different employees and designate certain sections of the building as being accessible to only a particular access level. This allows those with higher access levels full access to the entire building while employees with lower levels of access will be limited to where they are allowed. These different levels of access can be controlled remotely. If one category of employees has to be given elevated privileges for a limited time, that is possible with just the metaphorical flick of a switch in the access control system's control panel.

The access control level can also be tied to an employee's status with the company. This way, employees that are terminated can be blocked from accessing the building ever again. This protects the company from disgruntled employees who may want to cause damage on their way out. The granular level of control also means that the company saves money on security services as all areas of the building don't need to be physically monitored. Every business runs the risk of theft in some form or the other. Whether they are holding actual sellable inventory or the property they want to protect is digital in nature, every business needs protection from malicious actors that are out to get them. Access control systems allow two levels of protection. The first level of protection is from external intruders who are trying to infiltrate the premises. The second level of protection is from rogue employees snooping around in areas that they should not have access to. Access control systems maintain a log that can be used to track employee movement. The logs can also be used as evidence in a court of law if required.

Access control systems also make the entire property safer for all employees due to the assurance that the only people on the premises are the employees of the company. This enables them to work at ease during night shifts or weekends when they might be alone.

The systems can also be made more secure by getting rid of keys that can get stolen. If a physical key gets lost or stolen, the business may have to change all the locks in the building. If a digital key, like a card, gets stolen only that particular key is compromised and it can be flagged as such in the system. Moreover, the problem with physical keys can be completely avoided by the use of biometric identification systems.

Access control systems allow the company to run visitor programs that allow visitors and other personnel such as cleaning crews in certain sections of the building at certain times of the day. All of this can be controlled digitally according to calendars set up by the building's administrators.
