Baltimore is home to many neighborhoods, but the Curtis Bay neighborhood has many commercial businesses and industrial sites. The neighborhood is on steep sloping heights and four city blocks wide and fifteen blocks long. It is just east of the highly industrialized waterfront with three sides (northeast - east - southeast) bordering the bay. The cove area of "Curtis Bay" feeds to Curtis Creek which in turn is formed by the water merging from further south- Marley Creek and Furnace Branch/Creek, found in Anne Arundel County. Adjoining the east side of Thoms Cove is near Hawkins Point at the end of Marley Neck peninsula. Curtis Bay is a deep-water port that has been dredged so it can accommodate ships which come to Baltimore. The water around the harbor has some shipyards which annex onto the shore and forge manhole covers, steel bulkheads, and other items for use in marine industries.

The residential area of Curtis Bay is along three major north-south corridors: Curtis Avenue, Pennington Avenue (Maryland Route 173 on which all commercial businesses are located), and Fairhaven Avenue. One of these residential streets, named alphabetically for various types of trees, runs west to east. Curtis Bay's housing is composed of several types, the most common being townhouses and rowhouses. The city of Baltimore, Maryland, also offers a variety of housing. They offer townhouses, rowhouses, individual homes (both constructed of wood-frame, brick or stone) and grocery stores.
