

Plano Dentist Bobby Jivnani Explains What People Can Do With All of Their Old Invisalign Trays

Plano dentist, Bobby Jivnani has recently published a blog post that answers the question on what people should do with all of their old Invisalign trays. The answer to the question is to keep the old trays until the orthodontic treatment is completed. The old aligner trays may be useful to the orthodontist in the event that there is a dental movement that was not actually completed and the orthodontist has to go back and make an adjustment. Keeping the old Invisalign trays will also help the orthodontist monitor the patient's progress.

After the patient has completed the orthodontic treatment, he or she may want to keep the first and last aligners as tangible evidence of the progress made. However, it may not be likely for the patient to want to keep the large number of Invisalign trays used during the treatment. If such is the case, the patient can hand them over to the orthodontist who knows how to properly dispose of them.

It should be noted that while the Invisalign trays are made of plastic and should be recyclable, there are two factors that prevent them from being recycled. First of all, the Invisalign trays are produced using a blend of different plastics, particularly a multilayer polymer that makes it impossible to segregate. Second, they are actually officially classified as medical waste.
