Seattle, Wash. - It is the 25th anniversary of National Safety Month, an annual opportunity to plan to help keep others safe in the workplace and beyond. While safety should always be a priority every day, this month is a great time to spread safety awareness. Local Seattle Plumber, Raymark is participating in national safety month by providing safety information for customers.

Each week of national safety month highlights a different safety topic. The topics for the 2021 national safety month include preventing incidents before they start, addressing coronavirus concerns, feeling safe while on the job, and continuous safety improvement.

Plumbing-related safety information includes improving bathroom safety by adding non-slip surfaces to the tub or shower: Bathrooms can be particularly dangerous due to water, moisture, and items on the ground. To prevent accidents in the shower or tub, you might consider putting down non-slip mats, tiles, or strips.

"Locating the valve that shuts off your property's water supply is another essential plumbing safety step," the company says. "If you need to access the spot in the dark or it is hard to reach, keep the tools close so you can shut off the system quickly in an emergency." Additionally, water heaters that are set too high can cause injury if the temperature is not checked. The 25th-anniversary celebration invites the community to honor any individual whose actions inspire safety - whether that be a safety professional or a family member.
