Dependable Homebuyers has published a post answering questions about the Foreclosure process. The owner of the We Buy Houses company answers questions like how much time a homeowner has to sell once they've received a foreclosure letter. The post can be found at <https://activerain.com/blogsviw/5686519/selling-a-house-after-receiving-a-foreclosure-letter>. They also explain why it's a good idea to talk to a real estate professional as soon as possible.

"Once you get the foreclosure letter, time is running out for your house," according to Dependable Homebuyers. "If it's not sold by the date listed on that letter, then a foreclosure could start."

In some cases, a foreclosure can cause a homeowner to lose hundreds of thousands of dollars. This is because it can be difficult to get financing after going through foreclosure .

"It is possible that you can lose everything you've invested into the home after going through the foreclosure," according to Dependable Homebuyers. "This is why we recommend selling the house before the foreclosure process starts."

Another question the company answers is how to decide what a house is worth. According to them, it's not a bad idea to talk to a real estate professional before selling, especially if the owner don't live in that area.

"We recommend talking with an agent who specializes in selling homes for homeowners who are going through foreclosure," according to Dependable Homebuyers. "They can help you get the best price so that you don't lose money if the foreclosure is finalized."

Dependable Homebuyers has also published an article about how to keep a house free of damage during foreclosure. It explains why many investors think of foreclosed homes as being run down and in need of repair before they can be sold. The article also explains common damage found in foreclosure homes, such as hardwood floors ruined by pet urine and carpets ruined by water damage from broken pipes.

"Many investors see foreclosed homes as needing lots of work before they can be sold. But you don't need to think that your house needs a lot of repairs in order for it to sell," concludes Dependable Homebuyers.

It goes on to recommend how much money homeowners should put into fixing up their home before selling so that the property will look great when buyers tour the home. If they decide to list with a real estate agent, Homeowners can even save money by fixing things themselves or doing it with help from family members instead of hiring professionals.

"Homes that are in threat of Foreclosure often have problems with interior and exterior damages," according to Dependable Homebuyers. "It's sometimes difficult to remove all negative stigmas associated with these houses, even after repairs have been made."

The company goes on to explain that when homeowners put their house up for sale, there are certain necessary repairs most buyers expect to see. "You might need to upgrade the HVAC system so that it's more efficient," according to Dependable Homebuyers. "You might want to invest in a high-efficiency water heater or replace appliances with energy star products, too."

Dependable Homebuyers has been assisting sellers who are in difficult situations. Sellers can liquidate their properties with a direct sale to Dependable Homebuyers.
