Homeowners remodeling their homes have three broad options when it comes to picking cabinetry. The first option is stock cabinets that are made to fit the most common cabinet sizes. They are mass-produced and have a limited selection of styles, colors, and finishes that are meant to match the interiors of as many homes as possible. They are meant to be affordable with speedy installation times. The downside of stock cabinetry is that they are not distinctive in their look and feel. Stock cabinets can be described as bland and derivative and would be a mismatch for a home that has been furnished with love and care. Another option that homeowners can go for is semi-custom cabinets. These have more design and finish options available than stock cabinets but they also come at a significant cost.

Finally, the best option for homeowners that are going for a premium look and feel is custom cabinets. They are built to the specification of the homeowner?s preferences and measurements which eliminates any ambiguity and creates a solid fit and finish every time. They can be had in a range of finishes, stains, paints, glazes, and finishing techniques. The customer has complete control over the final product including the hardware, type of wood, presence of racks and inserts, shelving, and all kinds of custom embellishments that match the style of the rest of the kitchen or any other room of the house for which the cabinets are being built. When it comes to picking the most aesthetically pleasing cabinetry, it has to match the rest of the room?s decor - whether it be the kitchen, study room, bedroom, office, or outdoor area. The goal of the design process is to find cabinetry that blends in seamlessly with the home?s design language. Time spent picking out the right designs under the guidance of an experienced cabinet maker such as Safina Custom Cabinetry will help avoid a situation where the final product sticks out like a sore thumb, distracting from the beauty of the rest of the home.
