E-Web Marketing, a Sydney-based digital marketing agency that employs a holistic approach, has offered some times on improving paid advertising campaigns using Google Ads and social media. This was elucidated in a blog post that explained the importance of excluding the people who aren't likely to be interested in the product or service, thus, reducing wasted spending on paid advertising. This requires the use of negative keywords for the paid search campaign and consideration of various factors, such as the level of targeting, whether to use lists or keywords, and the various match types of the negative keywords.

Sam Shetty, CEO for E-Web Marketing, says, "Much like eating healthy and getting enough exercise, adding and refining negatives is a never-ending commitment. You will constantly need to work at it in order to keep your paid search campaigns optimised and running as profitably as possible. The good news is that it gets much easier the more you practice. And once you get to master it, your expertise with paid search negatives will allow you to play at a much higher, aggressive, and more cost-effective level than your competitors."

At the highest level of targeting using negative keywords, it is possible to exclude impressions for entire paid ads campaigns. For example, for luxury brands, one would not waste impressions for searches that contain the words ?cheap? or ?free.? Thus, these words can be utilised as negative keywords at the campaign level. On the other hand, negatives can be used to exclude impressions at the ad group level.

Negatives can be added either as keyword lists or keywords combined with a match type. And more negatives can be discovered using the keyword research tool or by filtering the organic keyword report in Google Analytics for any words that hardly get any conversions despite getting a lot of clicks. And it is also possible to exclude certain impressions without the use of negatives by simply applying a few tricks on advertising and conversion rate optimisation. Text ads can provide the best way to qualify and filter people before they click.

Meanwhile, E-Web Marketing also wants to emphasize the benefits of each social ads platforms in reaching targeting audiences. The marketing message can be delivered by Facebook ads, Instagram ads, LinkedIn ads, and Twitter ads, in order to reach out to the desired audiences in the social media platforms that they prefer the most.
