October 16, 2015 -
Michael Taggart has announced that he is attending the Dublin Web Summit, and that he will be featuring two of his Fintech startup companies, Remittio and Cryptonomex. The summit, which is scheduled to take place November 3rd through 5th, 2015, is the fourth of its kind. Originally launched with 400 attendees, the summit has grown in the past four years to include more than 20,000 attendees from over 110 different countries. Attendees typically range from startup companies to members of the esteemed Fortune 500 club. Many companies attend to secure investor backing and to launch their newest innovation in Tech.

Taggart's Remittio, which he will present during the summit, is poised to become a multinational payment transfer service, running entirely on the blockchain. He explains, "We want to show how our business works in providing security for those handling monetary transactions."

Cryptonomex, which Taggart will also showcase at the summit, is a custom blockchain development company. This company provides software development, and has created one of the most advanced blockchain platforms on the market, which is capable of processing more than 100,000 transactions a second. Average confirmation time for the platform is less than one second.

"The Web Summit is the perfect place to showcase these platforms," points out Michael Taggart. "There is not another conference in the world that will have as many developers and general technology driven companies in attendance, and we plan to show them all what we're made of."

Summit officials have projected that this year's attendance could easily surpass 30,000 attendees, from companies all over the world. Held in Dublin, Ireland, the Summit will be comprised of a number of smaller conferences and showcases, all within the same arena. The 2014 Summit focused on marketing, builders, and other internet technology related topics. A number of speakers and presenters are expected to be in attendance, representing some of the most renowned technology in the world, including 22 Fintech Startups.
