North Carolina has borne the brunt of plenty of storms and hurricanes that have caused massive amounts of damage and even loss of life. Hurricane Florence, a Category 1 storm that made landfall in 2018 in Wrightsville Beach caused catastrophic flooding across the state. It was North Carolina?s wettest hurricane as it dropped almost 3 feet of rain on the region. The prospect of global warming also makes it likely that the increased frequency of strong winds, storms, and hurricanes in recent times is going to become a fixture of the region?s climate. Homeowners and commercial property owners need to be prepared to deal with the water damage caused by the inevitable storm that lands on the state?s doorstep.

Water damage is particularly insidious as water soaks into the home?s structure and stays there, rotting the materials from the inside out. When moisture seeps through the wooden underlayment, walls and ceiling boards start to fall apart because they were not designed to be resilient to that situation. Many building materials, including furniture, upholstery, and cabinets, are susceptible to water absorption. Wooden fixtures can become distorted and warped, plaster and drywall will begin to crack, and fabrics will become home to bacteria if they are kept in contact with water for too long. Water damage has to be cleaned up fast and effectively in order to give the home or commercial property a fighting chance to be restored. The best solution is the use of advanced equipment to detect moisture and heavy machinery to quickly pump out the water at a breakneck speed to prevent it from further damaging the property.

Bryter Restoration aims to be the saving grace in and near Wilmington to provide water damage cleanup and restoration services to those in need. The company?s technicians are available for work 24 hours a day, 7 days a week, and 365 days a year. Customers going through an emergency can contact the company and it will send over its rapid response team to restore floors, walls, and personal property. Apart from flood damage, it also assists home and business owners to restore property damaged from broken pipes, slab leaks, and sump pump failures. They can restore any area of the building including crawl spaces, basements, and attics.

After arriving on a flooded property, the company uses industrial-strength fans and high-powered extraction units to extract water from the affected areas and dry them out before making any repairs. The company?s technicians then use advanced moisture detection equipment that helps them map out all the places in the property where the water may have migrated to. Once the excess moisture has been removed, the company can perform sterilization, dehumidification, and mold remediation. It offers a whole range of services that are required to restore the home such as repairing cosmetic and structural damage, remediating bacterial and mold growth, and fixing damaged electrical systems and appliances.

John Bryter talks about the company?s water cleanup and removal services by saying, ?Bryter Restoration employs IICRC (Institute of Inspection Cleaning and Restoration Certification) certified technicians that are experts in what they do and come with a ton of skills when it comes to dealing with flood and water damage.
