Fort Walton Beach, Fla. ? For many student loan borrowers, the staggering number of figures attached to their student loan debt can seem completely overwhelming. Furthermore, while managing to get student loan debt canceled via bankruptcy is possible, it can be extremely difficult. Bankruptcy assistance lawyers, Lewis and Jurnovoy, are here to discuss some possible changes to student loan bankruptcy rules.

Using bankruptcy to get student loan debt discharged requires that a borrower prove that they have ?undue hardship,? which can be problematic as many different jurisdictions have different standards for what qualifies as undue hardship. To prove undue hardship, a borrower must sue their student loan lender by initiating an ?adversary proceeding.? Such proceedings can be very long and expensive as nearly all lenders oppose the bankruptcy claim of the borrower. Due to this fact, a large number of borrowers don?t even make an effort to take this route to discharge their student loan debt.

Richard Cordray, Chief Operating Officer of Federal Student Aid, spoke at a hearing in October hosted by the House Committee on Education and Labor and expressed his commitment to reforming how federal student loan bankruptcy rules are structured. According to an article published in Forbes, ?Cordray indicated that the Biden administration is actively exploring ways of changing how the Department of Education treats undue hardship cases for federal student loan borrowers seeking a bankruptcy discharge. While he provided few specifics, advocates have suggested various metrics that the Department could use to support (rather than oppose) a borrower?s undue hardship claim, such as a consistent state of poverty over the course of many years, or reliance on earnings derived from public benefits such as Social Security. If the Department of Education stops opposing at least some borrowers trying to get undue hardship bankruptcy discharges, it would represent a huge shift, and could open the doors for many more borrowers seeking relief.?

The Fresh Start Through Bankruptcy Act, a bill sponsored by Senator John Cornyn and Senator Richard

Durbin, was unveiled in August which would waive the undue hardship proof needed for federal student loan borrowers meaning that no adversary hearing would take place. However, this bill would only count towards borrowers whose loans have been in repayment for at least 10 years. It is still unclear if the bill, regardless of having bipartisan backing, will move forward in Congress.
