A lot of residents all over the country, especially those in the Midwestern states, are suffering financially owing to the fickle economy and once-in-a-lifetime coronavirus pandemic. According to an estimate from the S&P Global Report dated March 19, 2020, midwestern states' GDP declined between 2.8% to 5.5% in the first quarter of 2020. Ohio reported close to 720 thousand continued unemployment claims as of April 29, 2020, thanks to the closure of the states' crucial steel and auto industries. This added fuel to the fire that was already simmering due to the midwestern states' weak agricultural sector and steadily declining oil prices. The second wave of the coronavirus hit the Midwestern states the hardest with the combined average daily new case rate between September and November 2020 increasing fivefold across Midwestern metro areas from 14.2 to 71.7.

In 2021, Toledo has an unemployment rate of 6.7% which is much higher than the national average of 6.0%.

2021 saw a decrease in the job market by 0.2% compared to the same time last year. Estimates for future job growth in the next decade are also mild compared to the rest of the country as experts believe that job growth in Toledo will max out at 22.1% compared to the outlook for the whole country which is looking at figures of around 33.5%. The dwindling job prospects and faltering economy translate to lower average incomes for working individuals. The average income of a Toledo resident is $19,113 a year while the US average is $28,555 a year. When considering the median household income, Toledo residents can expect to take home $33,485 a year while the US average is $53,482 a year. In Toledo, over 20% of employed individuals make minimum wage, which is less than $15K a year.

There is, however, some good news as the city has managed to rebound from a lot of the business closures due to newer avenues of employment opening up to absorb those who had lost their jobs. The 2017 closure of the Jeep Cherokee plant in Toledo was one of the biggest reasons for high unemployment numbers. In 2019, the start of the Jeep Gladiator production brought new jobs. Construction was another sector that saw an uptick due to the dramatic increase in building permits for apartments in 2018. The housing market in the city is also growing with house values continuing to grow about 5.4 percent per year.
