The cannabis producers Lucky Herbs sources their products from grow small batches, and cultivate their plants organically, because they understand that weed flower without extra chemicals is best both for the consumer of that weed and also for the environment in which the plants are grown. These small scale producers care about quality over quantity, and take the time to use best practices when growing their plants to ensure that quality. For example, small producers often trim their buds by hand, rather than using a mechanical weed trimmer, to preserve the trichomes on the flower which hold the terpenes and cannabinoids that produce the highs and other effects people reach to cannabis for.

The Canadian province of British Columbia has built a reputation for producing quality cannabis through a combination of the regional culture, geography and politics. First, the climate of the Pacific Northwest is well suited to growing cannabis, with long spring and fall seasons that make plants resilient, and warm sunny summers that help the plants grow tall and healthy. The Pacific Northwest also has ample rain through the entire year, which helps the soil be fertile and produce more potent weed. A history of lax enforcement of cannabis laws before cannabis was legalized in Canada meant British Columbia had widespread production and many experienced growers being open about their genetic experimentation when the legal market finally opened. This combination of experience and quality helps cannabis grown in British Columbia, Canada be extra tasty, potent, and clean burning, all good qualities in cannabis products.
