January 2022: NJDDC presents a new article that examines the eligibility conditions for cancer disability benefits. The report, published on NJDDC's website, was compiled by the company's experts. The report was released to aid anyone looking to see if they or a loved one qualifies for financial assistance.

Qualifying for disability involves a number of factors. Individuals who apply for disability benefits must meet specific eligibility requirements set by the Social Security Administration (SSA). Some individuals could qualify solely based on their cancer diagnosis, whereas others would require a biopsy or a physician's note verifying their illness is progressing or recurrent in order to qualify. The publication analyzes the eligibility criteria for receiving disability benefits. The experts in the report explained how eligibility is determined by the type and stage of cancer the patient has.

According to NJDDC, the guide was compiled after thorough research by the company's experts. The purpose of the publication was to provide clarity for anyone looking for financial assistance in case of a cancer diagnosis by guiding readers on how they can find out if they qualify for disability benefits. The guide described the qualification conditions to give a clear understanding of how a candidate is evaluated for eligibility under the SSA's requirements. The report uncovered the types of cancers that would automatically qualify someone for disability benefits. The full report can be found here.
