Indypendent Realty Group, a company based in Indianapolis, IN, has reported that senior home buyers are seeking very different characteristics in homes than they used to. This generation, known as the baby boomers, have recognized that senior life includes more than retirement and socializing, and are seeking ways to include active lifestyles and interests into real estate investments. This type of behavior has been noted by the Indy Senior Network, a group working to provide the support and opportunities which seniors seek during real estate transactions. The Network explains: "Taken as a whole, boomers remain a significantly active group - one less likely to consider a 65th birthday the end marker for their working life. Yet, for those buying a home in Indianapolis that will make their senior years as comfortable as possible, their choices are bound to differ greatly from those they have made in years past."

Those falling into this category are generally over the age of fifty. The company works not only with those looking to buy, but families and individuals who wish to sell their properties as well. All of the employees of this company are not only licensed Realtors, but also have a vast wealth of knowledge and experience in dealing primarily with senior clients.

The Indypendent Realty Group has noted some specific characteristics which many seniors are now looking for in new homes. These include home offices to continue work from home, large windows for more natural light during the day, wide hallways to promote aging in one space, and all-inclusive technology systems which provide access to various features through one easy to use panel or remote.

One of the realtors working so closely with seniors through this network is Debbie Sakson. She has invited any home buyer or seller who wishes to learn more about Indypendent Realty Group to check out the company blog. For more about Realtor Debbie, individuals are also encouraged to contact her through the Indypendent Realty Groups website. All of the contact information for phone, e-mail, and other online methods of communication are listed through the main site. This is also a place where seniors can read the company's "Moving On" Guide, and search for other Senior Real Estate Specialists (SRES) in their area.
