Toronto Functional Medicine Centre in Toronto, ON, Canada, has explained how people through functional medicine manage stress. In one of their recent posts, it was discussed how to fight stress with functional medicine. Specifically, the article recommends the functional medicine approach to stress with the use of supplements and lifestyle factors. This involves the use of adaptogens from a group of herbs and magnesium for stress management. It also requires making some changes to one's lifestyle.

Adaptogens may help the body "adapt" to stress, which means lower cortisol levels. In turn, this reduction in cortisol levels may help with pain, insomnia, and the prevention of chronic illnesses. As noted in an article in the journal, "Pharmaceuticals," adaptogens may also have an impact on the quality of life of patients when used as adjuvants in the conventional therapy of various pathological conditions and chronic diseases.

Meanwhile, magnesium is a mineral that is also vital for stress management. According to an article in "Nutrients," chronic latent deficiency seems to be common in the general population but even more so among those people who are suffering from various kinds of chronic illnesses or stress. And many studies have indicated a correlation between stress and lifestyle factors. For example, it has been found that a lack of sleep can result in higher cortisol levels.
