Currently, with more than 18 years of experience in home financing and about 250 five star reviews on Google, he continues to offer his knowledge and expertise, especially to help first time home buyers.

John Cornish can help first time home buyers benefit from one of the available state programs, the tax breaks, and home financing that is supported by the federal government. Since a new home is truly a large investment, practically all home buyers don?t have the entire amount to buy the property. Thus, it is essential to find a provider of home financing, for instance, the VA home program where the US Dept. of Veterans Affairs provides a guarantee for a percentage of the amount being borrowed, thus enabling the banks and other financial institutions to charge lower interest rates and offer better terms.

Unfortunately, the VA home financing program is only available for veterans, service members, and eligible surviving spouses. VA provides a home financing guaranty and other housing-related programs to help them with regards to buying, building, retaining, repairing or adapting a home for personal occupancy. The funding for the VA home programs comes from private financing companies but it is the VA that guarantees a certain portion of the amount to allow better terms to be offered.

Another option is the Federal Housing Administration (FHA) home financing program. This federal program has the goal of providing assistance to low- to moderate-income families in purchasing a home for themselves. The home financing deal is insured by the federal government and is issued by a bank or some other financial institution that has been approved by the FHA. An important advantage of the FHA home financing arrangement is its lower minimum down payment in contrast to the conventional home financing providers. In addition, those with lower credit scores may also get approved. First time home buyers frequently find the FHA home financing deal to be the most affordable option for them.
