TX based Tech Dogs is now accepting printer repair drop offs at their Plano location. Customers are welcome to stop by at any time if they have a printer that is in need of servicing. The company states that their technicians will assess the damage and give the customer an estimate as soon as possible. Customers are requested to call ahead when they are on their way.

One of the most common issues with printers is that they always seem to need maintenance. While these devices are incredibly useful, they also tend to behave quite delicately, which means an experienced technician is often needed to get them working again. Notably, Tech Dogs recommends that printer owners check their ink levels, make sure the device is plugged in correctly, connected to their computer properly and so on before coming to the conclusion that it is broken. Many issues are simply caused by user error, and while they cannot all be fixed by the user as well, it is worth both their time and money to check for the usual issues before approaching an expert.

The company points out that many sources can easily be found online that share step-by-step instructions in such an event. These sources are available in both text and video format, so users may pick whichever they feel comfortable with. However, Tech Dogs cautions them against trying certain fixes that may be well out of their scope. Clearing a paper jam or refilling the ink may be a relatively simple task, but attempting to get into the printer's interior circuitry and so on can have drastic consequences. On one hand, the printer may be broken beyond repair to the point where it needs a much more expensive repair than if the owner had left it alone. On the other hand, they may get electrocuted.

Tech Dogs acknowledges that it may be difficult for some customers to determine whether their printer needs a professional to take a look at it. In most cases, the company suggests that they bring the printer to their technicians if they cannot check with a friend or family member who is more experienced with such devices. This will reduce the chance of them making matters worse if the issue is serious. Fortunately, however, there are certain signs they can look out for that will help them decide if they should get their printer serviced.

One symptom of a faulty printer is constant clogging in its ink systems. In general, printers are designed to avoid clogging as much as possible, so frequent clogs can indicate that something is wrong. Tech Dogs can help if this is the case. Similarly, printer owners may notice that their print heads need to be cleaned far more often than appears reasonable. The company says that certain brands may not use the right materials or techniques to manufacture their printers, so customers might notice that they need to clean the print heads about as much as they use the printer. Tech Dogs says they should be able to use the printer at least once every few days with zero issues.

One of the most common issues reported by customers is that their printer is working much slower than expected. While this can be relatively hard to spot if the printer is faulty (or poorly designed) out of the box, users may notice that the device suddenly stops working as efficiently as it used to. Tech Dogs points out that some printers can output at higher quality if made to do so, so the issue may simply be a setting that accidentally got changed. The opposite of this is true as well ? some printers can print much faster but at reduced quality.

Whatever the problem may be, customers can rest assured that the team of Tech Dogs has the tools and expertise required to handle it. The company specializes in keeping printers up and running for their customers, and they look forward to helping their community at every opportunity. Interested parties need only call the company before they stop by for a convenient printer repair drop off. Tech Dogs can be reached via phone or email.
