They may incur medical costs and other expenses related to the ongoing care, such as medical bills, physical therapy, rehabilitation, travel expenses to and from medical appointments, medications, medical devices, and live-in nursing care. The catastrophic injury could make the victim disabled, and they may not be able to contribute to household income or household chores.

Catastrophic injuries can affect the emotional well-being of a victim, and they might suffer from depression, anxiety, mental anguish, lost quality of life, humiliation, inconvenience, and post-traumatic stress disorder. The blog post adds that the victim?s family is also likely to suffer from non-economic damages, including the loss of affection, care, parental guidance, or spousal consortium, which often translates into higher damage awards for catastrophic injury lawsuits.
