Choice Men's Health In Atlanta, Georgia, discuss the fastest ways to treat erectile dysfunction (ED) in a recent article on their website. Erectile dysfunction treatment options may include ED medication, penile implants, and surgery, and each of their patients are thoroughly assessed in order to determine the best course of treatment for their individual needs.

Regardless of age, erectile dysfunction (sometimes known as impotence) can be a significant problem for many men. ED is the inability to maintain a firm erection during sexual activity or other sexual interactions, and a man's sex drive and intimate relationships may suffer as a result. Every man will inevitably have ED at some point, it needs to be evaluated when it persists frequently. Erectile dysfunction can be brought on by a number of factors, including underlying medical conditions that include cardiovascular disease, mental or relationship difficulties, certain prescriptions (for blood pressure), smoking, narcotics, or heavy use of alcohol. Fortunately, knowing the cause also makes it possible to treat ED.

In most cases, a physical examination and responses to inquiries about a person's medical history are sufficient to make a diagnosis of erectile dysfunction, whereupon a medical professional may suggest a course of action. If a patient already has an underlying problem, their doctor may arrange for more testing or a specialist visit. Physical examinations (wherein the doctor looks for indications of abnormalities in the penis and testicles) might include tests for ED or underlying disorders. Blood testing can reveal a person's risk for heart disease, diabetes, low testosterone, and many other conditions. Diabetes and other medical disorders can also be detected with a urine test, and blood flow issues may be diagnosed with an ultrasound. Additionally, as part of the process, the person will undergo psychological testing.

Erectile dysfunction can be treated or prevented in several ways. Simple lifestyle adjustments are frequently the best erectile dysfunction therapies. The most notable impact on sexual dysfunctions is regular exercise. Exercise helps prevent ED from developing and, if it already exists, can help reverse it. It enhances blood flow, which is crucial to a strong erection improves blood supply and can assist men in maintaining an erection during sexual activity. By raising the amount of nitric oxide in blood vessels, proper blood flow also lowers blood pressure. Erectile dysfunction drugs function in much the same way.

Exercises that involve lifting weights also boost testosterone production in the body. Healthy sexual desire and erectile function depend on testosterone. Erectile dysfunction is also directly impacted by diet as well, and the risk of ED can be reduced with a diet high in fruit, vegetables, whole grains, and seafood (while minimizing red meat, refined grains, and processed foods). A healthy weight can be maintained in part by eating well. In addition to increasing the risk of ED, obesity also raises the risk of diabetes, vascular disease, and heart disease. The article goes on to say that some patients may require medication. There are ED drugs men can take to improve their sexual performance, along with medications that can be taken in order to manage underlying health conditions (as they may serve to lower blood sugar levels, decrease high blood cholesterol or treat kidney diseases). If low levels of testosterone cause ED, a doctor may prescribe testosterone supplementation or testosterone replacement therapy.

Poor sleep is often a contributing factor to erectile dysfunction. Studies have found an intricate relationship between the level of sex hormones like testosterone, sexual function, and sleep. Adhering to a strict sleep schedule is a natural erectile dysfunction remedy. Surgical treatment for ED is also an option, and it typically consists of penile implants or surgeries to repair damaged blood vessels (revascularization surgery). For men with ongoing erectile dysfunction, penile implants can restore sexual function. The healthcare professionals at Choice Men's Health will help each patient figure out the best and quickest way to treat their erectile dysfunction.
