Alexander Shunnarah Trial Attorneys has posted a blog to explain the trucking rules and regulations that must be abided by. These rules are created to keep the truck driver and other drivers safe by minimizing the risks of accidents.

Alexander Shunnarah, Founder and President of Alexander Shunnarah Trial Attorneys, says, ?The trucking industry is an essential part of our economy, but with that many trucks on the roads, there are bound to be accidents.? The rules and regulations are implemented to reduce the frequency of truck accidents in Dallas.

The article lists some regulations that apply to trucking companies, including testing all drivers for drugs and alcohol. The blog explains that the trucking company can face civil penalties if they don?t comply with regulations.

Truckers face many risks on the road every day. With long drives, they spend hours on the road. One important law to prevent truckers from becoming drowsy is limiting the consecutive time they are allowed behind the wheel. These laws require drivers to rest every eight hours during driving shifts and restrict the length of time a driver can work without taking breaks. The article points out that some companies encourage drivers to ignore these rules of hours of service to meet strict deadlines, which is a negligent action that often leads to accidents.

Truck drivers are required to maintain a complete record of every trip they take. This includes all information about the location the load was picked up, the travel time taken to complete the route, and the type of truck they used. The blog post states that a driver might also have to pay a penalty for incomplete logs.

Truck drivers have special insurance rules and must inspect their vehicles before, during, and post-trip, including checking tires, inspecting the load, preventing leaks, and ensuring proper loading and securing of the cargo. According to the trial attorneys, failure to follow the rules and regulations makes a driver liable to fines, and strict legal action can be taken against them in the event of an accident.

Accidents involving semi-trucks can be caused by many factors, including driver error, poor truck maintenance, manufacturer defect, or improper loading. Depending on the cause of the accident, the negligent party could be the trucker, the trucking company, the truck manufacturer, or the loading company. The best way to decipher who is responsible is to hire a Dallas truck accident lawyer.
