September 19, 2022

Atlanta, Georgia - September 19, 2022 -
Alexander Shunnarah Trial Attorneys helps families of fatal accidents in its latest blog post by explaining wrongful death benefits. The law firm understands how tough it is for the family to bear the loss of a loved one in a wrongful death incident and explains the right to compensation of the victim's family. Alexander Shunnarah, Founder and President of Alexander Shunnarah Trial Attorneys, explains the compensation benefits available for the financial difficulties and emotional trauma a family experiences due to the death of a loved one caused by the carelessness, recklessness, or malicious activities of another person.

The blog post explains that parents, spouses, children, or an estate representative of the deceased are able to file a wrongful death claim. In some states, more distant relatives might also be able to argue their case, as anyone who suffers financially due to the death may file a compensation claim for economic and non-economic damages. The blog post explains the different types of damages that the survivors are eligible for - economic, non-economic, and punitive.

Economic damages include compensation for medical bills, funeral costs, lost wages, and loss of inheritance. These damages are considered economic because they have a direct financial amount associated with them and are not subjective.

Noneconomic damages have no direct financial amount associated and are subjective. Noneconomic damages include compensation for pain and suffering, loss and grief, and loss of companionship.

Some states may also award punitive damages depending on the severity of negligence that caused the death. These are damages awarded in addition to economic and non-economic damages as a punishment for gross negligence and to deter others from taking the same actions.

The blog post elucidates that the plaintiff must establish negligence by clear and convincing proof, proving that the defendant?s actions caused harm.

An experienced Atlanta wrongful death attorney is the best person to fight for a victim's compensation claim. Personal injury attorneys experienced in handling wrongful death claims can help the victim?s family calculate the damages.
