

Shipping Store in Seattle Urges Community to Recognize Signs of Money Scams

Seattle, Wash. ? The Mailbox Seattle, a shipping center in Seattle, WA, has noticed an uptick in money scams being perpetrated in their community and wants to warn people to remain vigilant and do their research before sending money, either via mail or digitally. By being aware of the red flags and taking precautions, residents can help protect themselves from becoming a victim of fraud.

Electronic money transfer has revolutionized the way people live and conduct business. It is now possible to make payments and send money without having to worry about carrying cash or a checkbook. However, although electronic payments are increasingly convenient, they also come with the danger of being scammed. By luring victims in with a phone call, letter or even just a few clicks on the internet, scammers can easily get their hands on some quick cash.

Imposter scams take on many guises, but they all swindle victims out of money by deception. Whether it is an email or phone call telling someone that they have won a prize and just need to pay a nominal fee, telling someone to send money via wire transfer or cash in the mail to avoid legal action from a government office, or being asked to bail out a friend or family member in dire straits, it can all be part of an elaborate scheme. With so many ways for these thieves to steal hard-earned cash from people, it pays (literally) to be extra careful.

It is important to always investigate before taking any action if something feels off about a call, email or letter asking for money to be sent. Receipt of a prize notification, for example, should be researched to make sure that the promotion is legitimate and that any fees needing to be paid are valid. It is also worth noting that a government office will never request money to be wired or cash to be mailed to pay an overdue fee. If such a request is made, reach out to the government office in question and determine if any overdue fees exist. Finally, if a random text, email or call comes through requesting immediate funds to be wired or mailed to rescue a friend or family member, contact that person directly to ensure he or she truly requires it.

As a local business and provider of package drop off services, The Mailbox Seattle strives to keep its neighborhood informed and is hoping that by sharing the easy methods outlined above, its customers will avoid becoming victims of money scams.
