November 15, 2022 -
Michigan probation violation attorney Paul J. Tafelski (https://www.michigandefenselaw.com/blog/violating-probation/) releases a new article that explains the consequences of a probation violation in Michigan. The lawyer mentions that criminal convictions sometimes lead to probation instead of jail time. Probation is usually considered an alternative to getting jail time.

?Probation is a period of time when you are supervised and ordered to follow a set of terms and conditions called an Order of Probation. You must prove you can follow the Order of Probation and not get into any more trouble in order to avoid going to jail or suffering other consequences,? the Michigan probation violation attorney says.

The lawyer explains that probation is often given for felonies and misdemeanors such as drunk driving and domestic violence instead of jail time. The terms of the probation depend on the defendant?s criminal records and the judge has the freedom to impose any term they feel is related to the case.

Attorney Paul Tafelski says that the goal of probation is to rehabilitate the accused if they?re convicted of a crime. In an ideal scenario, probation should help the accused improve and lessen their probability of committing another offense.

In the article, attorney Paul J. Tafelski mentions that if someone violates their probation, the consequences may vary. If the violation is severe, the probation may be revoked and the accused may be sent to jail. In some cases, the judge may just impose additional requirements or make the probationary period longer.

?The strength of your arguments at the hearing and the justification for your actions will help to determine how your probation violation affects your future. It is helpful to have an experienced Michigan probation violations lawyer representing your interests at this hearing,? says the criminal defense lawyer.

Lastly, attorney Paul J. Tafelski emphasizes that it is important for someone who is accused of violating their probation to seek the help of a skilled defense lawyer right away. Having an experienced lawyer may be able to help the accused have an effective defense strategy and protect their freedom.
