Long Island grand larceny attorney Edward Palermo (<https://edpalermo.com/long-island-grand-larceny-attorney/>) releases a new article explaining the grand larceny laws in NY. The lawyer mentions that larceny is considered a major-index crime category in New York under the federal Uniform Crime Reporting system. A major-index crime is categorized as such due to the severity of the crime by nature and in volume.

Aside from being a major-index crime, grand larceny is also considered one of the seven major NYS Penal Law felonies. When discussing laws of theft in New York, it is necessary to define the terms "property" and "owner". An owner of a property is someone who has the legal right to possess and use the property," the Long Island grand larceny attorney says.

The lawyer explains that someone is guilty of the act of larceny if they illegally take, obtain, or withhold an owner of their property for the defendant's use. Larceny includes acts such as embezzlement, appropriation of lost or mislaid property, theft by false promise, issuing a bad check, and extortion.

Attorney Edward Palermo adds that possession of the stolen property is not necessary to be charged with grand larceny. Even if a person does not keep the stolen property and instead disposes of it, it still counts as larceny as the guilty party would have still deprived the owner of the use of the property. This is why it is important to seek the help of an experienced attorney when someone is facing grand larceny charges.

In the article, attorney Palermo says, "Grand larceny differs from other crimes of theft like petit larceny due to the value of the amounts stolen. Petit larceny is the charge usually brought on crimes like shoplifting. Petit larceny is a misdemeanor. However, a person can also be charged with felony shoplifting if they steal property with a value of more than $1,000."

Lastly, attorney Palermo emphasizes the importance of having a skilled criminal defense lawyer when facing grand larceny charges on Long Island. Having an experienced lawyer may be able to help the defendant protect their rights and their freedom.
