December 08, 2022 -
Long Island elder law attorney Seth Schlessel (https://www.schlessellaw.com/long-island-elder-law-attorney/) releases a new article explaining New York?s Long-term Medicaid Planning. The lawyer mentions that New Yorkers over 65 often have unique legal needs which can be best addressed by an elder law attorney. These legal needs include asset protection, counseling, and qualifying for Medicaid for nursing home care.

?People face many new challenges as they get older. Senior adults need assistance in navigating complex legal terrains, such as estate planning and long-term care. Elder law attorneys are trained specifically to help older people and their families with many legal matters,? says the Long Island elder law attorney.

The lawyer explains that an elder law attorney may be able to help senior adults with anything from estate planning, Medicaid eligibility, and guardianship arrangements. Elder law lawyers can be a great resource for a loved one who is navigating the process of growing old.

Attorney Seth Schlessel also says that Medicare and private insurance usually won't cover nursing home stays for long periods. While some families are able to cover the costs of nursing homes or invest in long-term insurance, other families will have to use Medicaid. This can mean that assets that were not transferred at market value within the five preceding years may make the person ineligible for Medicaid.

In the article, attorney Seth Schlessel adds that estate planning is an important part of protecting the legacy of a person. A comprehensive estate plan may help a person decide where their assets should go as well as plan their loved one's caretaker once they pass away. An estate plan may help ensure that the client?s future, their loved ones, and their assets are cared for.

According to the estate planning lawyer, ?The main difference between elder law and general estate planning is that elder law deals with seniors in the implementation of estate plans. This includes long-term care and incapacity as well as wealth transfer at death. Elder law lawyers can assist clients with Medicare, Medicaid, and Guardianship issues. These are particularly important for seniors as they age.?

Lastly, attorney Schlessel emphasizes that having an elder law attorney in Nassau County or Suffolk county is important when facing elder law matters. A skilled lawyer may be able to help the client save money while also planning their future in an efficient manner.
