The Match Artist, a photographer based in Dallas, Texas, would like to reach out to singles in the area who may want to have their dating profile?s photo taken by a professional. Those who hire this premier dating photography service will be able to improve their bio and profile in order to increase their chances of finding a date. As a professional photographer, The Match Artist knows how to make anyone look good, and the company is accustomed to helping customers present their best aspects to online matches. With the help of The Match Artist, dozens of people have seen their online popularity shoot up practically overnight.

?The vast majority of people on Tinder, Bumble or Hinge, for example, will never read the bio without first being lured in by a photo that, for them, has potential,? says The Match Artist. ?It is often subtle cues that signal to a prospect they should take a closer look at you. Dating photography specializes in making sure that not only are you seen in the best light, but that those subtle cues are more prominent. That's why dating photography is an instrumental part of building a dating profile that helps you attract the right people. However, a lot more goes into dating photography, which includes research into what attracts the people you want to date. Everyone is different and is attracted to an entirely different set of physical or facial attributes. It goes without saying that specific facial and physical attributes are more attractive for some people than others.?

Dating photography is rapidly growing in popularity as more and more people realize how important it is to make a great first impression online. Often, a person?s lack of success on various dating apps can be linked to the first impression they make through their pictures. A badly taken picture, such as one that is taken in bad light and from an unflattering angle, can cause a person to swipe left where they might otherwise have been interested. Many dating platforms encourage a ?picture first? approach where the first item put in front of other users is a profile picture. If the picture makes a good enough impression, the other user is far more likely to want to match.

While dating photographs need to make a good first impression, they should also be honest and show off some of the subject?s best attributes without looking overdone. At The Match Artist, they believe that there is a fine line between having an attractive photograph and having a picture that looks overly edited or ?fake.? Social media and dating apps have taught people to identify doctored photos, and posting an obviously edited photo on a dating profile is just as likely to make a negative impression on viewers as a badly taken photo. A professional dating photographer gives customers a distinct edge over other people on the site as the vast majority use selfies taken on a cell phone camera.

?As dating photographers, we know that you have about 3 seconds to make an initial, great impression,? the professional profile photographer says. ?Those initial 3 seconds can make or break your profile. That's why we work so hard to make sure our clients send out the right subliminal cues. Our dating photographers help you gain those extra seconds (long enough for the prospect to read your bio). Speaking of which, we tend to think your pictures are a lot more critical than your bio, but a well-written bio will mean that a lot of those prospects attracted by your dating profile picture are motivated to contact you. The first step to ensuring that we get your dating profile right is to consult with us. Dating photography requires us to create a profile of who you're trying to attract and then take photos just for them. It isn't uncommon for us to take several dozen photos before we short through to figure out which ones will have the most impact.?
