December 21, 2022 -

Jacksonville, Florida ? Just one week after Jacksonville Tree Service Experts' website was hacked, the company earlier today announced it had managed to get it back.

"Jacksonville Tree Service Experts had lost its website to hackers earlier last week," said the CEO. "That was a big blow to the company as it couldn't receive any bookings through the website. To maintain the already built relationship with the clients that only used the website to make their bookings, Jacksonville Tree Service Experts had to look for a team of software engineers to help them develop a new website."

The CEO revealed that Jacksonville Tree Service Experts had worked with a team of newbies to build its website. He also noted that after a consultation with a group of experts, they advised the company to get the lost website back and improve it instead of developing a new one.

"When Jacksonville Tree Service Experts thought of developing a website for the first time, the company was operating under a tight budget and therefore was not ready to invest a lot of money," said the CEO. "Therefore, the company looked for the cheapest team of developers around. Since no experienced developer would have accepted the then company's budget, the company had to work with a group of newbies who even went lower than the company's budget. Two weeks later, the company had received a website that served its purpose well for about an year and it was then hacked. The situation served as a wake-up call and the Jacksonville Tree Service Experts team was willing to let go of good money to get a good website. Through the internet, the company learned about a group of developers whom after reading their reviews the company decided to give them a trial. After a consultation, the team advised the company to get its old website back and improve it instead of developing a new one. That sounded like a good idea and the company allowed the team to go ahead."

The CEO noted that the improved website had enough security, and hence the chances of the website being hacked again were 0%. He added that it also had other important features that were absent earlier.

“The company is grateful to the hackers because they made the company realize that a better version of the website existed,” said the CEO. “The newly improved website has high-security features that allow no one else to access the website apart from the company. This means that, under no circumstance that the website can be hacked again. Also, the website has a click-to-call feature that allows homeowners to call the company without having to leave the website first. What else? The company can easily collect the homeowners’ emails through the website, which they can use later for follow-up after services.”

Reportedly, Jacksonville Tree Service Experts uses a media room site to share about any changes made to the company with its clients.

“In a company, change is always happening,” said the CEO. “Website improvement is just one of those changes that happen in the company now and then. To keep its clients updated, Jacksonville Tree Service Experts shares about the changes through its media room.”

The CEO finished by urging homeowners in Jacksonville and its suburbs to make their tree care bookings with Jacksonville Tree Service Experts.

“Apart from sending an email and making a call,” said the CEO, “website is the only other tool that allows homeowners to make their bookings in the comfort of their homes. Homeowners in Jacksonville and its suburbs should take the advantage of this and leave their bookings on the website. The company will respond immediately and deliver good services like it has been doing for decades now.”
