releases a new article explaining the importance of having honest communication between a client and their divorce lawyer. The lawyer mentions that when hiring a divorce lawyer, the person is also hiring a legal advocate. Keeping information from that legal representative can hurt the client in the end.

According to the Manhattan divorce attorney, "When you have a divorce lawyer representing your legal interests, it's important to disclose any relevant information to ensure that he or she has the facts to represent you to the fullest. This often means sharing information that you may not be proud of. But having it out in the open enables your lawyer to proactively deal with it instead of reactively dealing with it."

As an experienced divorce attorney in New York City, attorney Juan Luciano understands that the decision to end a marriage can be a difficult and emotional one. It is important for clients to feel comfortable and confident in their lawyer's representation, which is why attorney Luciano strongly encourages open and honest communication between attorney and client.

First and foremost, it is essential that clients understand that attorney-client privilege protects the confidentiality of the information shared between attorney and client. This means that anything discussed between the two parties cannot be revealed to anyone else without the client's explicit permission. This includes any potentially embarrassing or incriminating information.

However, while attorney-client privilege offers a certain level of protection, it is not absolute. There are certain exceptions to the rule, such as if the information being shared is intended to further a crime or fraud. In these cases, the attorney may be required to disclose the information to the proper authorities.

While it may be tempting to keep certain details private, it is ultimately in the clients' best interests to be completely transparent with their divorce attorney. This ensures that we are able to provide the most effective representation possible, and helps to ensure the best possible outcome for our clients.

Lastly, attorney Juan Luciano believes that having a skilled attorney in matters such as child custody and divorce makes all the difference. A skilled attorney may be able to help the client receive a more favorable outcome in the divorce case.
