

The Mabra Law Firm Elucidates on Who Will Pay for the Medical Expenses After a Car Accident

Atlanta, Georgia - January 17, 2023 -
The Mabra Law Firm, based in Atlanta, GA, has elucidated on who will pay for the medical expenses after a car accident. In a recently published blog post, the firm points out that Georgia is an ?at-fault? state, which means that the party who caused the crash is the one who will ultimately pay for the medical bills for injuries sustained in the car accident in Georgia. However, it has to be proven that the other party?s negligence was the reason for the collision and caused the injuries. It is important to note that a person is considered to be negligent in a particular situation where they are needed to act carefully but failed to do so. Under Georgia law, the negligent party will have to compensate the victim for all damages and losses resulting from the negligent act, including medical expenses.

Ronnie Mabra from The Mabra Law Firm says, ?If you get into an accident, you?re responsible for making sure your medical bills are paid as you incur them. You have to take care of your medical bills until any underlying insurance claim or personal injury lawsuit is resolved with the at-fault party. A car accident victim in Georgia should contact a reputable car accident lawyer immediately after their accident. Your lawyer will explain how to collect payment for medical bills and claim damages over and above medical expenses like lost wages, property damage, and pain and suffering.?

The medical costs that will need to be considered after a car accident in Georgia include: surgical expenses; future medical needs; diagnostic tests; chiropractic care; emergency room expenses; doctor bills; medical supplies; in-patient hospital costs; rehabilitation and follow-up care expenses; ambulance transportation fees; physical therapy; and medication.

Aside from a few exceptions, the law in Georgia doesn?t typically mandate the at-fault driver to pay for the medical expenses of the accident victim on an ongoing basis. The exceptions are: when the car accident happens in a no-fault state; the accident triggers medical payments from insurance or some similar coverage; or there are workers? compensation claims. Under such coverages, the accident victim will usually submit their medical bills as they come in from the medical providers. And rolling claims can be paid out by the insurance provider until the limit is reached.

With the above exceptions aside, the at-fault party or their health insurer is not usually required to pay for the medical expenses as they come in. Later on, if the other party has been proven to be at fault in court, the court will order them to pay for the damages. Most cases get settled long before a lawsuit is filed or a trial occurs. And until the case is resolved, the accident victim will be responsible for the payment of their medical bills.

Meanwhile, although drivers in Georgia are not mandated to buy personal injury protection (PIP) coverage, this coverage is still good for drivers in Georgia to have along with their auto insurance. PIP offers coverage for a fixed amount of medical costs and lost wages resulting from a car accident. Most drivers will carry a minimum of $10,000 of protection. With minor injuries, PIP might provide all the coverage that is required for the medical costs. Unfortunately, medical expenses can rise up quickly and will usually exceed the minimum PIP coverage of $10,000. When this happens, other sources are health insurance and possibly medical liens and hospital liens.

A good lawyer who can be depended on by a car accident victim is someone with legal experience in getting maximum compensation from the negligent party for the victim?s financial recovery.
