Houston, TX based Insurance Navy Brokers recently published a blog post that sheds light on Texas' most current car seat laws. The article is meant to explain the law to local residents and help them make decisions that keep them safer on the roads. Over 12,000 car crashes are reported in Texas every year, and they result in almost 16,000 serious injuries. A lot of these accidents could potentially be avoided if Texas drivers had a better grasp of the law, and the firm attempts to address this issue through their publications and other resources.

Children in particular face an increased risk of injury and death in the event of a vehicle accident, and this is why there has been a concerted effort to educate drivers on car seat laws. The post says, "Developing bodies and fragile immune systems make children more susceptible to serious injury or death than their adult counterparts. Yet, many parents have not been adequately educated on how to properly and legally secure their children according to federal safety standards when hitting the roadways. According to the CDC, many victims of insufficient or improper seat belt use across the United States were underage children. These children (35%) were either improperly restrained or were wearing no seat belt at all. The result? A 2017 report revealed that failure to adhere to seat belt and car seat laws resulted in 116,000 severe injuries to children.?

The front seat is particularly dangerous for young children, so the law states that rear-facing car seats must be placed in the back of the vehicle facing backwards. Placing a rear-facing car seat in the front passenger seat is illegal and can be deadly in the event of an accident. In this position, a young child will be struck by both the side and front airbags if an accident occurs, and the speed at which they deploy has been known to cause injuries to the face, head and neck (which could be enough to seriously injure or even kill a small child). The law prescribes a number of other precautions aimed at protecting all car passengers, and Insurance Navy's blog post goes into great detail about some of the things that can be done to ensure that everyone remains safe.

Knowing the law and observing it can greatly reduce the chances of serious injury in a car accident, but accidents still happen even if drivers follow the law to the letter and exercise extreme caution. This is why it is important to have adequate car accident insurance, especially for drivers with young children.
