The most durable and best in aesthetics are wood doors. However, these doors require high maintenance and are more costly than other materials. So when choosing wood front door replacements, experts advised choosing the ones constructed from wood-veneer skins and engineered-wood core, which reduces damages.

Another preferred material for front doors, especially for residential properties, is steel. It is cost-effective, offers security, and resists harsh weather conditions like strong winds. Maintenance is also less expensive for steel doors.

Fiberglass is also becoming a popular option as a front door replacement. They have smooth skin, making painting a one-touch job. These doors are also energy-efficient, need little maintenance, and resist wear and tear. Some homeowners use aluminum residential doors.
