Arrowhead Clinic Personal Injury Chiropractor Offers Services to Personal Injury Accident Victims

March 07, 2023

Peachtree City, Georgia - March 07, 2023 -
Arrowhead Clinic, a personal injury chiropractic practice with offices in various locations in Georgia, wants to point out that they are offering chiropractic services for people involved in an accident that resulted in a personal injury. This service is for people who sustained an injury in a car accident, are suffering from chronic pain, or other health issues that persist and will not go away. They want to provide information on what a chiropractor can do for such cases and how to find one.

Dr. Harry Brown, founder of Arrowhead Clinic, says, ?Looking for relief from an auto accident injury, chronic pain, or other irritating health issues that won't go away? In that case, it might be time to find a local chiropractor who specializes on personal injury. Our team of personal injury chiropractors can diagnose, treat and prevent conditions caused by imbalances in the spine, joints, and throughout the body. For some people, seeing a chiropractor can solve their problems without taking medicines or undergoing expensive surgeries.?

A chiropractor who specializes in personal injuries is a healthcare professional who offers treatment for trauma-related injuries, such as auto accident injuries or repetitive stress. A chiropractor is capable of diagnosing, treating, and preventing imbalances in various parts of the body, including those in the joints and the spine. Some people have found that a chiropractor can offer help with their pain without having to take pain medication or undergo costly surgical procedures.

The chiropractor has the capability to provide treatment for both acute and chronic injuries. Acute injuries include contusions, whiplash, sprains, and strains. Chronic personal injuries include carpal tunnel syndrome, tendonitis, low back pain, and even arthritis that are typically not linked to a single event but were caused by repetitive movement or overuse for a long period of time. Chronic personal injuries need different treatments from those that are applicable for acute injuries and they frequently require ongoing and long-term care.

A personal injury chiropractor can do various kinds of chiropractic adjustments for treating injuries caused by personal accidents. These include manual adjustments, cranial sacral therapy, extremity adjustments, instrument-assisted adjustments, and activator methods. Manual adjustments employ force to mobilize joints and restore the appropriate alignment of the muscles and musculoskeletal systems. Manual adjustments are typically done on the neck, jaw, or spine. Some of these chiropractic adjustments can be done quickly and need more force compared to other methods.

Cranial sacral therapy is similar to a manual adjustment except that it is gentler and it is focused on the head. Instead of deep thrusts, this method employs gentle manipulation to locate misalignments in the cranium and pelvis and correct them.

Extremity chiropractic adjustments are done on the arms, writes, legs, including the feet and ankles. These mobilization methods are designed to help restore normal joint movement in the extremities.

They can also use special instruments to help perform the adjustments. This is usually done to adjust those hard-to-reach parts of the body, for instance, the sacroiliac joint. These special instruments can be used to focus accurately at angles that are hard to manipulate manually.

The Activator Method is an instrument-assisted method of chiropractic adjustment that utilizes a low-force instrument to deliver a quick, controlled force into the malfunctioning spinal segments. This method enables accurate targeting and avoids tissue trauma.

Started in 1977, Arrowhead Clinic has a group of leading chiropractors and car accident doctors in 18 clinics located in various places around the state of Georgia. Currently, they have treated more than 400,000 accident victims during the last 45 years and they have developed a reputation of being leaders in the chiropractic industry. They have in-house x-ray equipment for diagnosing injuries during the patient?s first appointment. Aside from car accident injuries, they can also treat the usual kinds of pain and injuries.

Those who are looking for a reliable personal injury chiropractor can visit the Arrowhead Clinic website or contact them over the phone.

A personal injury chiropractor is a health care professional specializing in treating injuries and conditions resulting from trauma, such as car accidents or repetitive stress. Our chiropractors can diagnose, treat and prevent conditions caused by imbalances in the spine, joints, and throughout the body. For some people, seeing a chiropractor for their injuries can solve their problems without taking medicines or undergoing expensive surgeries Here are some of the ways a chiropractor will adjust you to relieve pain. Different Types of Treatments Different Types of Treatments The type of adjustment used in a chiropractic session can vary depending on each individual's needs. For injuries resulting from personal accidents, several common adjustments could be used to treat joint or muscle pain, stiffness, and discomfort. Manual Adjustments Manual Adjustments This adjustment applies force to mobilize joints and works by restoring proper alignment to the musculoskeletal system. These adjustments are typically performed quickly and require more force than other methods. Manual adjustments are commonly made on the spine, neck, and jaw. Cranial Sacral Therapy Cranial Sacral Therapy This therapy is similar to manual adjustments but is gentler and focused solely on the head area. It uses gentle manipulation (as opposed to deep thrusts) around the cranium and pelvis to detect misalignments and correct them to restore balance in the head area. Extremity Adjustments Extremity Adjustments These adjustments are usually made on the arms, legs, wrists, ankles, and feet. They involve mobilization techniques that help restore regular joint movements to these extremities. Instrument-Assisted Adjustments Instrument-Assisted Adjustments This technique uses special instruments to adjust hard-to-reach areas of the body, such as the sacroiliac joints. The instruments focus pressure precisely at different angles where manual manipulation may be difficult or impossible. Activator Methods Activator Methods The Activator Method? is a form of instrument-assisted chiropractic adjusting that uses a low-force instrument device to deliver a controlled, rapid impulse into dysfunctional spinal segments allowing for precise targeting without tissue trauma or unnecessary muscle tension while also avoiding pain or discomfort during treatment. Personal Injury Chiropractic Care FAQ's What types of injuries do personal injury chiropractors treat? A personal injury chiropractor can treat acute and chronic injuries. Acute injuries like whiplash, contusions (bruising), strains, and sprains occur suddenly. Chronic personal injuries such as tendonitis, carpal tunnel syndrome, low back pain, and even arthritis are usually unrelated to a single event but result from overuse or repetitive movement over time. These conditions require different treatments than an acute injury and often need ongoing, long-term care. What are the Different types of adjustments a personal injury chiropractor will use? The type of adjustment used in a chiropractic session can vary depending on each individual's needs. Here are several common methods. Manual Adjustments Cranial Sacral Therapy Extremity Adjustments Instrument Assisted Adjustments Activator Methods How much does personal injury chiropractic care cost? The cost of personal injury chiropractic care can vary widely, depending on various factors. Generally, the complexity and severity of the injury will dictate how long it takes for treatment to be effective and, therefore, how much the overall cost of treatment may be. Insurance coverage is also essential when determining personal injury chiropractic care costs. It is important to review your insurance policy in detail to understand what is and isn't covered since this can affect the total out-of-pocket costs. Some insurance plans may cover a portion of chiropractic visits and treatments, while others may not cover anything at all. What qualifications should I look for when seeking out a personal injury chiropractor? When searching for a personal injury chiropractor, certification and professional experience should be considered. Only those with the proper credentials and qualifications should be considered to provide quality care and treatments. Licensing requirements vary by state and are regulated by the governing boards of each state Additionally, having a personal injury chiropractor who is board certified in treating musculoskeletal trauma can be beneficial due to their higher level of education and experience. Board certification relates explicitly to those with advanced training in specialty areas, such as neurology, sports medicine, or musculoskeletal trauma rehabilitation. Furthermore, membership in professional organizations indicates a commitment to continuing education and dedication to their field of practice, which may further improve prospects for successful outcomes when seeking relief from acute or chronic pain caused by activities or accidents. Generally, the complexity and severity of the injury will dictate how long it takes for treatment to be effective and, therefore, how much the overall cost of treatment may be.  Insurance coverage is also essential when determining personal injury chiropractic care costs. It is important to review your insurance policy in detail to understand what is and isn't covered since this can affect the total out-of-pocket costs.  Some insurance plans may cover a portion of chiropractic visits and treatments, while others may not cover anything at all.", experience should be considered. Only those with the proper credentials and qualifications should be considered to provide quality care and treatments. Licensing requirements vary by state and are regulated by the governing boards of each state  Additionally, having a personal injury chiropractor who is board certified in treating musculoskeletal trauma can be beneficial due to their higher level of education and experience.

Board certification relates explicitly to those with advanced training in specialty areas, such as neurology, sports medicine, or musculoskeletal trauma rehabilitation.  Furthermore, membership in professional organizations indicates a commitment to continuing education and dedication to their field of practice, which may further improve prospects for successful outcomes when seeking relief from acute or chronic pain caused by activities or accidents.",
