Lexington, KY - To promote tree conservation, Lexington Tree Experts and local soap maker, Natural Care Soaps, have teamed up to create a unique line of soaps made from tree extracts. The collaboration seeks to help spread the message of environmental stewardship and the importance of preserving and protecting trees in the community.

The tree-based soap is made through an all-natural process that uses locally sourced ingredients and essential oils. It is also certified by the Forest Stewardship Council, which promotes environmentally responsible forest management practices. The new product will be available in various scents and sizes, ranging from traditional bar soaps to liquid hand soaps.

Emmy Jessica, CEO of Lexington Tree Experts, had this to say about the new collaboration: "At Lexington Tree Experts, we believe in the power of trees. We recognize their role in providing clean air, water, food, and products for everyday needs. With this unique new product, we're excited to collaborate with Natural Care Soaps to promote tree conservation in our community."

Natural Care Soaps CEO, Frank Richards, echoed Jessica's enthusiasm for the collaboration: "This is a great opportunity for us to use our craft to make a difference. We are excited to participate in this meaningful project and help promote environmental stewardship in our community."

The tree-based soap is part of a more significant effort by both companies to advocate for tree conservation. As part of this initiative, they will donate a portion of the proceeds from their collaborative efforts to a local nonprofit dedicated to protecting and preserving trees in the area.

In addition to their joint efforts, each company has its own initiatives focused on promoting environmental stewardship and tree conservation. For example, Lexington Tree Experts has developed several educational programs and activities that teach people about trees' importance and how to care for them properly. Meanwhile, Natural Care Soaps has partnered with several local farmers to source natural ingredients for their products and use sustainable packaging materials.

The collaboration between Lexington Tree Experts and Natural Care Soaps represents a shared commitment to promoting environmental stewardship in the community.
