May 11, 2023 -
The SEO Fight Club team recently released their latest episode, titled "Corpus Problems In AI Detection", on their YouTube channel. In this episode, the team explores AI training corpus issues. The focus is how documents appearing frequently in a training corpus can be mistakenly identified as AI generated documents. This can lead to some unusual and amusing errors.

The episode delves into the complexities of training an AI model, particularly with regards to the corpus used for training. The team explains that the quality and diversity of the corpus can greatly impact the accuracy and reliability of the AI model. Documents and passages that appear frequently in the corpus can result in overfitting the models. When the training corpus is not diverse enough and certain documents or passages are overrepresented, the AI model may become overly specialized and fail to generalize well to unseen data. It becomes too focused on specific patterns and fails to capture the broader context.

"We've seen some really funny examples of AI-generated documents that are actually just copies of documents that appeared frequently in the training corpus," said Lee Witcher. "Documents that existed prior to the invention of computers, machine learning algorithms, and natural language processing can be falsely classified as AI generated content."

"It's a reminder of the importance of having a diverse and comprehensive training corpus to ensure accurate and reliable results," said Ted Kubaitis.

The team also offers some tips on how to avoid common pitfalls in training an AI model, such as selecting a diverse corpus and carefully tuning hyperparameters. AI detection errors have lead to people being fired or suspended from educational institutions. The episode highlights the need for users of AI and AI detection to understand how large language models work to avoid potential problems and false accusations.
