NEW PORT RICHEY, FL - July 12, 2023 -
New Port Richey, FL ? Clean Recovery Centers in New Port Rickey has been doing their due diligence by providing educational tools to their communities. In their latest blog post, they discuss the dangers of cocaine use, as well as the signs and symptoms of a cocaine overdose.

?The public needs to know that cocaine can lead to heart attacks and strokes, and there is no medication to administer that will counteract the effects. When we think of a drug overdose, we often think of opioids and how narcan can reverse the effects. That is not the same for cocaine; there is no way to reverse or reduce the effects it is having on the body,? the article states.

Cocaine is a stimulant and is often used in ?binge sessions.? The effects that cocaine produces only last around 15 to 30 minutes, meaning the person will want to use more to keep the feelings going. This is how an overdose occurs. Some of the first signs that can be noticeable in a potential overdose include breathing and heart rate changes. Rapid heart rate and shallow breathing are indicators that the body is not tolerating the amount of cocaine in the system. It is important to monitor these symptoms for progression.

The most common symptoms of cocaine overdose include increased body temperature, profuse sweating, chest pain, nausea or vomiting, and seizures. If an overdose is ignored, the dangers become life-threatening.

Continued cocaine use can stop the heart, leading to coma and death. This is especially true for those who have mixed substances, such as cocaine and alcohol. Because alcohol is a depressant, the person may feel like the two have canceled each other out and continue to use them.

?Anyone who uses cocaine is at risk for overdose as even the first time can cause it. Teens are at higher risk for developing cocaine dependence. The brain is not fully developed in the teen years, and neural pathways can be learned quicker than in adults. Engaging in risky or experimental behaviors is also common among teens.

Those who are genetically predisposed to have a heart condition are at risk for cocaine overdose. Even if a heart condition is not present, prolonged cocaine use can cause it to appear sooner or cause more damage than just the condition alone. The heart is not capable of muscle regeneration, so any damage done by cocaine will be irreversible,? the article continues.

Undiagnosed mental health conditions, genetic predisposition for risky behaviors, health concerns such as high blood pressure, and using cocaine at an early age are all risk factors for developing a cocaine use disorder. Clean Recovery Centers has helped hundreds overcome addiction through their unique, three-phase approach to treatment.
