Ontario, California - August 16, 2023 -
Napolin Accident Injury Lawyer, a personal injury law firm based in Ontario, CA, who also offers the services of a car accident lawyer near me Ontario residents can rely on, has recently released a blog post on the issue of workers? compensation combined with workplace drug testing. This has become a contentious issue, raising several ethical and legal questions. In California, workers compensation benefits are paid regardless of who is at fault for a work-related accident or illness. However, some factors may affect a worker?s eligibility.

In California, employers can require drug tests for their employees to ensure a safe and productive workplace. A failed drug test can affect an employee?s workers compensation claim. For instance, if a worker has been found to be intoxicated at the time of an accident and this intoxication directly led to the injury, the workers compensation benefits may be denied. Some California courts had simply denied claims from workers who failed their drug tests after the accident but some courts have ruled in favor of the workers, pointing out that intoxication has to be the primary reason for the injury for the benefits to be denied.

Car accidents are quite common in California. Statistically speaking, most people will get involved in at least one car accident at some point in their lives. Alexander D. Napolin says, ?Anyone who has ever been the victim of a car accident can tell you that they are harrowing experiences and it can be natural for emotions to run high in the hours, days and even weeks after the event. It's important to understand that, at its core, a car accident case deals with not only personal injury law, but also traffic law. It's also important to understand that the level of compensation that you are entitled to often goes above and beyond the money required to fix your car. While a personal injury attorney can definitely help make sure that your vehicle is fixed and back on the road as quickly as possible (or replaced entirely), you shouldn't forget about your injuries.?
